Since the discovery of HIV/AIDS over 30 years ago, the diagnosis, prevention, and treatment of this disease has changed dramatically. Although screening for this disease is critically important in the diagnosis of HIV/AIDS, it is also important to develop and use new diagnostic and detection technology that can produce faster and more sensitive results. The development and use of such technology also provides clinicians and researchers with the ability to have more precise diagnoses of HIV/AIDS and to differentiate between HIV infection and other diseases. In addition, such technologies provide epidemiologists with the ability to detect the presence of specific HIV subtypes, resistance to drug therapies, and levels of HIV infection in asymptomatic patients and to identify changes in CD4+ T cells and other biological markers associated with the progression of HIV infection. This is a brief review of the range of diagnostic and detection technology currently available and an overview of the different areas in which it could be used.Minority Affairs Minister Omar Abdullah suspended on Friday alleged that Pakistan was behind the kidnapping of five Indian boys, held captive by an armed group in Gurdaspur district, with the state seemingly using militants to fulfil its agenda. In his latest blog, the Jammu and Kashmir Chief Minister said that the government needs to investigate the matter and if that is found to be true then "we will deal with the facts as we see them". While the government was investigating the matter, the disappearance of the boys triggered public anger in India as it appeared that the state government itself was not doing enough and that the Centre must take this incident seriously. A group of five Indian teenagers was allegedly kidnapped in Kathua district in January this year. Gurdaspur superintendent of police (SP) Chandan Gupta confirmed the incident to Firstpost, saying f678ea9f9e
